WHISTLING a gay tune, Peter Porkchops walked breezily down Main Street. He passed by Jones' Fish Market, and turned his head to smile a greeting at his friend, Sam Jones. What he saw made him stop whistling, and instantly wiped the cheerful smile from his face.

For on the window, was a big sign which read: Going Out Of Business. Inside, with a glum expression, sat Sam Jones. He was half-heartedly swatting flies with one hand, and was running the other through his hair. Peter popped in the door.

"What's the matter, Mr. Jones?" he asked. "What's this Going Out Of Business business?"

"There isn't any," said Sam. "Haven't sold a fish in three days. I can't last any longer, that's all."

"Hm," said Peter, thinking hard. "That's bad—but there ought to be something we can do about it. Have you tried reducing prices?"

"Yep," said Mr. Jones. "Right now I'm selling fish, or trying to, for less than I paid for them."

Peter thought harder. Suddenly, he had an idea.

"Let's raise 'em," he said.

"Don't be silly," said Mr. Jones. "Who'd buy them then?"

"Everybody," said Peter. "By the way, have you any fishing tackle?"

"Of course not," said Sam.

"Well then," said Peter. "I'll just dash home, and get my rod and line. Be back in a flash."

Leaving Sam Jones standing open-mouthed in wonder in the doorway of his fish-market, Peter dashed for home. A short while later, he returned carrying his fishing rod and tackle.

"O.K.," said Peter to the amazed Mr. Jones. "String up a bunch of fish."

Mumbling to himself in puzzlement, Sam Jones soon had fifteen or twenty good-sized fish strung on a line. Peter swung them over his shoulder, grabbed his line and tackle, and went off.

"Be back in a flash with some cash," said Peter to Sam, who scratched his head some more.

Peter had barely gone a block, when a man stopped him. He too, carried a fishing rod—but no fish.

"Nice catch," he said to Peter. "Where did you get them?"

"Secret," said Peter, walking on.

"Just a minute," said the man. "I'll give you ten dollars for the lot."

"Well," said Peter. "I was er going to er—uh . . ."

"Fifteen dollars," said the man.

"Well, all right," said Peter, talking as if he hated to part with them. "It's a deal."

The man paid Peter the money, and strode off happily. Peter ran back as fast as he could to Jones' Fish Market. He slapped the money on the counter.

"What did I tell you?" he exclaimed to the happy Sam Jones. "String up some more, I've found a way to sell your fish. Fishless fishermen just gobble them up at fancy prices."

Again and again, Peter Porkchops left the fish market with a string of fish, and his fishing tackle, returning shortly with a fistful of money. Never had Sam Jones done such a wonderful business!

Peter returned once more, and turned over the money. Sam had a big string of fish all ready. The biggest string he had fixed up so far.

"Look, Peter," said Sam. "Thanks to you, I've sold nearly every fish in the store. This is all I have left. Take them as a reward for your wonderful help."

"Gee, Mr. Jones," said Peter. "Thanks, and I'm glad I got the idea. It worked like a charm, didn't it?"

Peter shouldered his string, took his fishing tackle, and waving goodbye to Mr. Jones, he went off.

Whistling gaily, Peter sauntered up the street past a high board fence. He reached the end of the fence, and was about to turn the corner, when . .

He looked up into the scowling face of A. Wolf!

"Where did you steal those fish?" Wolf demanded.

"I didn't steal them," said Peter.

"Certainly you did," said Wolf. "Where else would anybody get so many at this time of the year? Hand them over, or I'll have you arrested."

Peter well knew that there wasn't anything he could do. A. Wolf was too big and husky to argue with. Then Peter had a thought.

"O.K., Wolfie," he said. "Please don't tell anybody. And I tell you what. Take my fishing tackle too, and then it will look as if you caught them."

"Now you're being smart," said Wolf, grabbing the fish and tackle, and walking off.

Peter watched him go, and then dashed off in the opposite direction. Soon he returned with an old friend of his, and both made for the corner near where A. Wolf lived. Sure enough, as Peter expected, there was Wolf in the middle of a crowd of admiring people. As Peter and his friend came up, they heard Wolf say:

"Yep, caught 'em all myself down in the old swimming hole in the brook," he bragged, as he held up the big fish.

Peter's friend spoke up, as he showed the badge—Fish warden.

"You did, did you? Let me see your fishing license."

Wolf's face dropped a foot.

"I er-uh haven't got any, and anyway I didn't . . ." he stuttered.

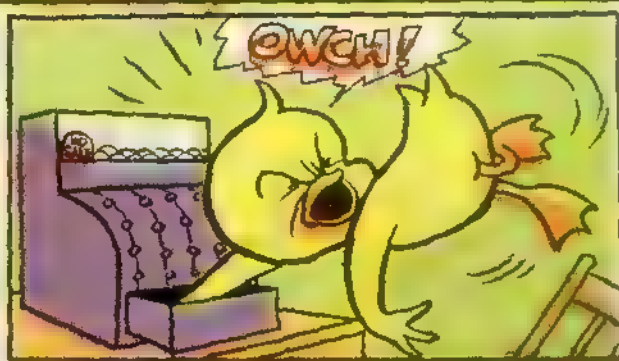

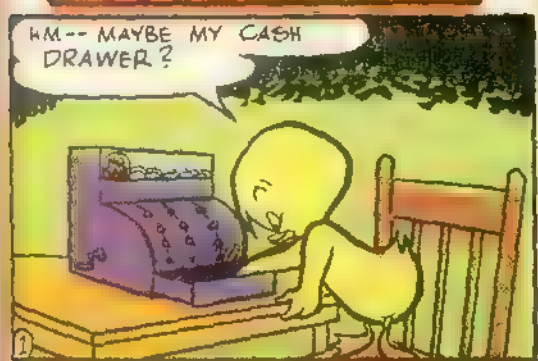

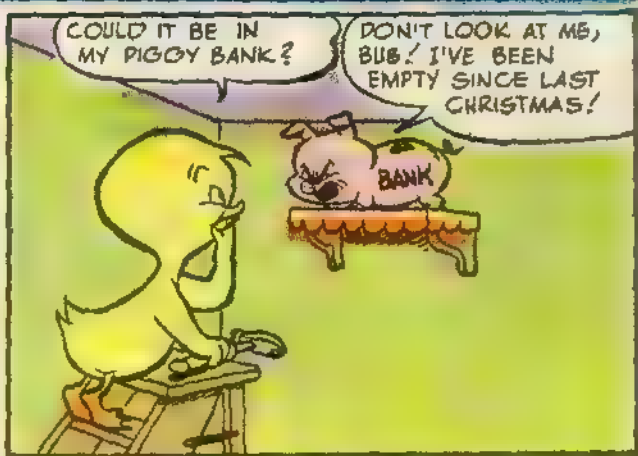

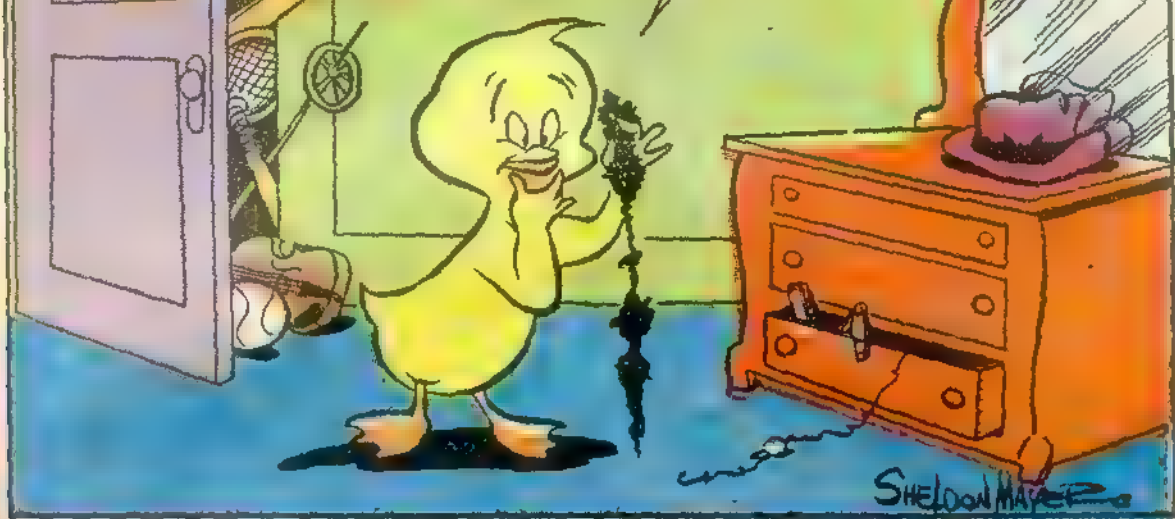

"All these witnesses heard you say that you caught these fish. That's a fifty dollar fine for fishing without a license. Come with me."

A short while later, with A. Wolf locked up for failure to pay his fine, the warden gave the fish to Peter.

"Here, take them," he said. "They've served their purpose as evidence. By the way, what are they? I've never seen those kind caught in these parts."

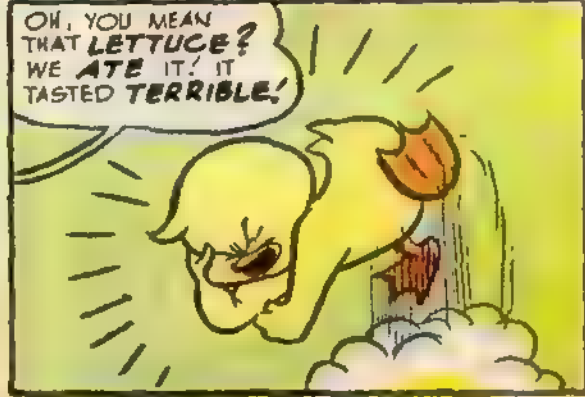

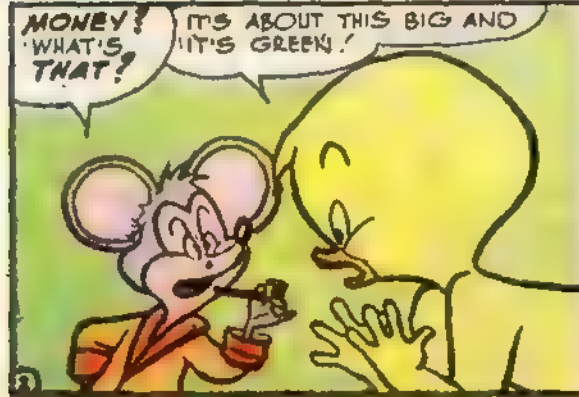

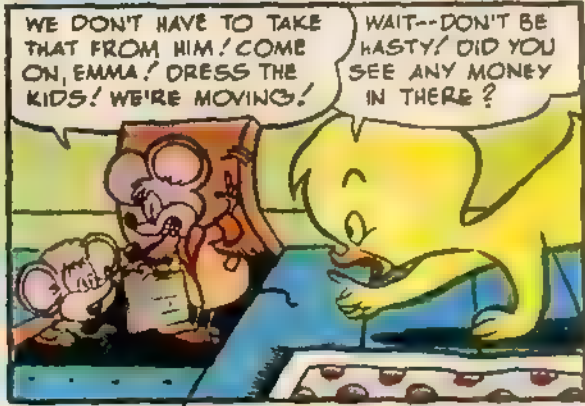

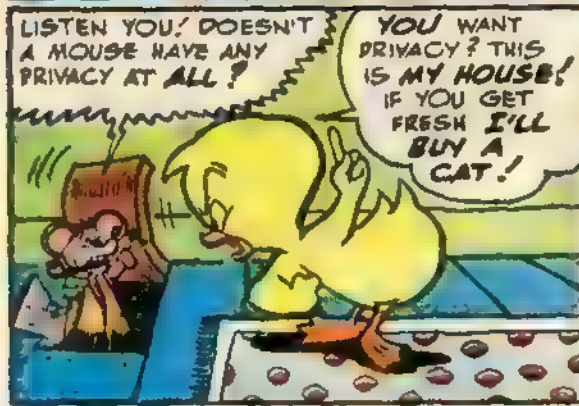

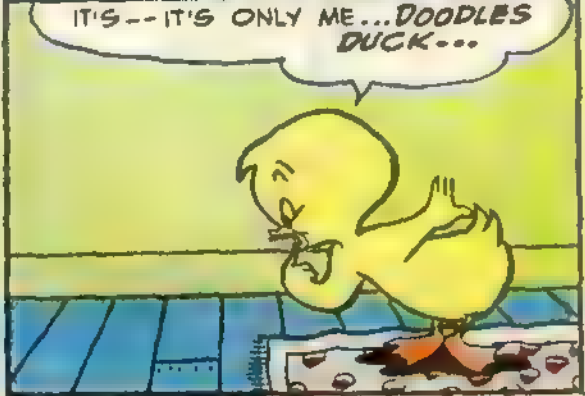

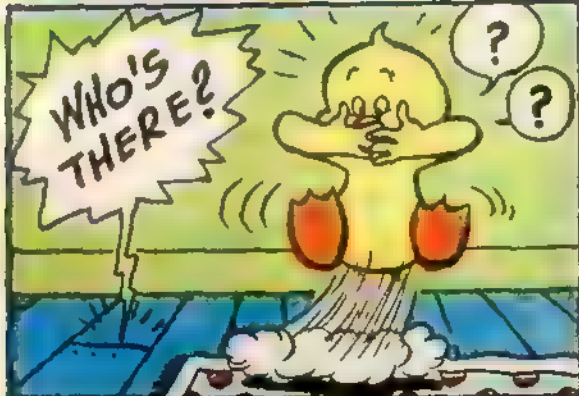

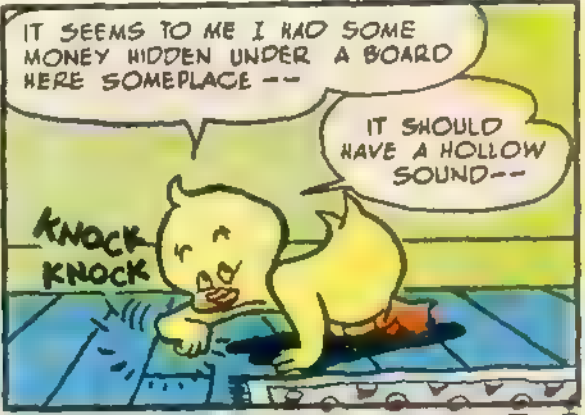

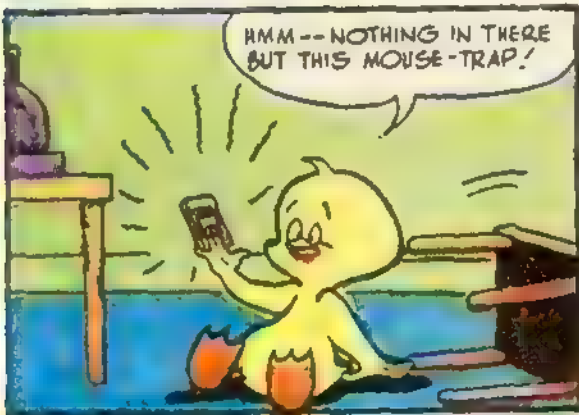

"Well, you're a fresh water Fish Warden," said Peter Porkchops. "These are Cod, Herring, Bluefish and Flounder, all Salt Water Fish. Wolfie never could tell a good fish story."
